Abstract: Ethical, legal, and societal considerations inevitably accompany scientific and technological research and development, but most of the thinking to date about how such considerations should be handled has been limited to R&D in a civilian context. How and to what extent, if any, do similar considerations apply in a military context, and especially when rapidly changing and/or readily available technologies are at issue? This talk may be relevant to policy makers, funders of military and other national security R&D, and the scientists and technologists engaged in such R&D.
